

Frontend Inspirations

Link to recipe app: <https://cookbookmanager.com/>

I like that this home page makes effective use of white space—using white and gray tones for the background, while having most of the main content centered in a pleasing, tidy layout. I think it looks organized, and the dishes that are shown really stand out from the neutral colors. I think the hamburger menu at the top allows for important information and navigation to be stored neatly and not clutter the page, while providing easy, intuitive access to the rest of the app. Overall, it is simple, organized, aesthetic, and all of the important features are easy to access. Not to mention, the easy download methods being prominently displayed, the help button, and the featured rating are all very nice touches and urge the user to pursue the product further.

Once you download the app, you get this page, which does more of what I commended on the landing page. This page makes great use of white space, and its simplicity makes it look modern, easy to use, and functional. The icons are easy to understand and help the user to navigate around and interact with the website. I like the graphic of the food in the background and the way the icons are transparent enough to see the peppers and leaves in the background. I will say, I don't care for the search view—I think it is rather unintuitive, and I aim to produce views that are easier to use.